

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

JAMES B. ATLESON is Professor of Law at the State University of New York at Buffalo. His research interests involve social and historical aspects of labor relations and labor law.

ANGELA BROWNE is a social psychologist specializing in the area of family violence, with particular expertise in patterns of physical assault and threat in couple relationships and the effects of family violence on victims. For the past decade, she has conducted research on the precipitants of battered-women homicides and has acted as a consultant and expert in the application of the self-defense plea to such cases. She is an Assistant Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Massachusetts Medical School; Founding Editor of the research journal, Violence and Victims; and author of the recently published book, When Battered Women Kill (Macmillan/Free Press, 1987).

ELLEN G. COHN is a doctoral student at the Institute of Criminology at the University of Cambridge. Her work on this article was conducted both at the University of Maryland and the Crime Control Institute, where she also worked on the Milwaukee replication of the domestic violence arrest experiment. Her current work addresses patterns of temporal variation in crime.

HERBERT JACOB is Professor of Political Science and is on the Research Faculty of the Center of Urban Affairs and Policy Research at Northwestern University. His current research is on the consequences of divorce laws. His most recent book is Silent Revolution: The Transformation of Divorce Law in the United States (1988).

RICHARD LEMPert is Professor of Law and Sociology at the University of Michigan. He is a past editor of the Law & Society Review and recently has completed a term as chair of the National Research Council's Committee on Research on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice. His current research focuses on the rent collection and eviction processes of a local public housing authority.

RAYMOND PATERNOSTER is currently an Associate Professor at the Institute of Criminal Justice and Criminology, University of Maryland, College Park. His research interests include deterrence and rational-choice theory, the relationship between base-rate information and estimation of risk probabilities, and various issues in capital punishment.

2 ABOUT THE AUTHORS

LAWRENCE W. SHERMAN is Professor of Criminology at the University of Maryland, College Park, and President of the Crime Control Institute in Washington, D.C. He is currently directing a replication of the Minneapolis Domestic Violence Experiment in collaboration with the Milwaukee Police Department and assembling a data archive on other field experiments in deterrence.

KIRK R. WILLIAMS is Associate Professor in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology and Research Associate in the Family Research Laboratory at the University of New Hampshire. He has published articles on inequality, violence, and social control, and is a principal investigator in national studies of homicide as well as deterrence and violence between intimate partners.