NEW FROM IVP ACADEMIC

"[Robert Rea's] careful, thought-provoking study shows why there is no biblical reason to fear 'tradition' properly understood, but every reason to heed believers from the past as guides to Christian life today. Most importantly, the book is successful in explaining why full commitment to Scripture demands close and respectful attention to the past."

Mark Noll, University of Notre Dame

"This is essential reading for all who teach or study church history or historical theology—two fields which Rea would prefer not to separate—since it offers not only an overview of the methods and concerns of theologians in the past but also important insights into how their work is received by Christian commentators in the present day."

Mary Cunningham, University of Nottingham, England

What similarities and differences were there between the Reformation in England and in Germany in regard to Christian ethics? The authors of this volume trace general considerations about ethics on both sides and address concrete fields of activity such as marriage, law, economy, war and diplomacy.

Sister Reformations II – Schwesterreformationen II

Reformations and Ethics in Germany and in England –
Reformation und Ethik in
Deutschland und in England
Edited by / Herausgegeben von
Dorothea Wendebourg and / und
Alec Ryrie

The authors of this volume deal with the similarities and differences between the Reformation in England and in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation in regard to Christian ethics. Although it was understood by all sides that ethics was part of the Christian life, its place in theology was a matter of dispute, not only between the Reformation and its opponents but also among the various schools of thought in the Reformation. The articles in this volume deal with answers given by advocates of the Reformation in England and in Germany to the question of the theological place of ethics, and in addition with decisions and behavioral maxims here and there, such as for example ethics of law, the economy, war or diplomacy.
