

a brother. How much this was borne out when, during the visit of a party of British actuaries to America, Robertson's name was mentioned! How he would have enjoyed a personal meeting with many who had to be content to send a message by mutual friends! He was so enthusiastic, so full of life, that one was never dull in his company, and no doubt it was this buoyant spirit which infected his students and gave them constant encouragement in their efforts. His enthusiasm was not confined to his professional work; it found equal scope in his play and he had the same reputation in a wide circle of football devotees as he had amongst his professional friends.

Edinburgh is the poorer without him and his city pays its own tribute to him; in London and the world over, wherever his students are found, there will long remain memories of that cheery elder brother, whom, as they all grew older together, they called "Willie Robertson".
