The following proposal has been submitted by Jo Freeman for consideration at the annual business meeting:

Resolution to be presented at the Business Meeting of the 1981 convention of the American Political Science Association:

WHEREAS more and more political scientists must seek nonacademic jobs in order to be gainfully employed;

WHEREAS most nonacademic employers do not view the training given by political science departments to be relevant to their employment needs;

WHEREAS this view is forcing political scientists to take marginal positions, to retrain in order to acquire more saleable credentials, and/or to alter their professional identities and loyalties to another field;

WHEREAS the American Political Science Association seeks to retain the membership and loyalty of such political scientists.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED:

That the American Political Science Association fund a half-time position for a professional job developer. Such person would:

- (1) research employers and positions for which training in political science would provide suitable job candidates by analyzing the actual skills and abilities (not paper credentials) required to perform the job;
- (2) visit such employers to educate them about the availability and desirability of political scientists as potential employees;
- (3) inform political scientists and political science departments about non-academic employment opportunities and any specific skills required;

(4) run employment workshops at the annual convention to educate political scientists on job search strategies and to introduce them to potential employers;

(5) perform any other activity which would increase the employability and influence of political scientists.

Representative Cheney, a former APSA Congressional Fellow and former Chief of Staff in the White House under President Ford, was elected by his Republican colleagues in the House to serve as Chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee during the 1981-82 Congress. He is one of the few members ever to be elected to a leadership position after only one term in office.

Representative DeNardis taught political science and served as Department Chairman at Albertus Magnus College and was a member of the Connecticut State Senate from 1970 to 1980. In the House of Representatives he serves on the Committee on Education and Labor and on the Committee on Government Operations.
