NATURE AND CIVILIZATION: Some Implications for Politics

Mulford Q. Sibley

fullness in justice and love. The author is especially interested in establishing a perspective on the never-ending puzzle of man's relation to Nature and civilization and setting the recent environmental and technological-ecological issues in the framework of political philosophy. $14.95 cloth

Sibley sees the challenge of civilization as the challenge of modern politics. Political challenge is the task of ordering and controlling the forces of modern civilization in accord with man's potential

The author asserts that although destiny is personal, it is also universally human and becomes accessible only as we recognize our responsibility for the common life of humanity — a life that links generations in history. To be open to and to act upon the demands of universal destiny is “the true political art,” a phrase that Plato applied to Socrates' conduct of his own life. Available August 1981 $16.95 cloth

NEW DIRECTIONS IN LABOR ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

late to the economic crisis of inflation and stagnation in the U.S. Charles Killingsworth opens the discussion by noting the achievements and failures of federal full-employment policies since 1950. Lester Thurow then seeks an explanation for inflation and unemployment. The final two essays by Charles Craypo and David Gordon analyze the post-World War II behavior of unions. Available July 1981 $16.95 cloth; $6.95 paper

These essays provide a succinct description and analysis of current problems and trends in union-management economics and how these relate

“The Demands of Justice is a remarkably lucid discussion of recent views and controversies which will be quite unusually valuable in teaching both moral philosophy and political theory. Moreover, it is in its own right an interesting and original contribution to the discussion.” — Alasdair MacIntyre
