

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Greetings from the Old South. Yes, the INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL OF LEGAL INFORMATION (IJLI) has migrated from its former host institution, the Yale Law Library in New Haven, Connecticut, to a new home well south of the Mason-Dixon Line: Emory Law Library, in Atlanta, Georgia. As editor of the IJLI, the Journal follows me, and because I took a new position this summer as Library Director at Emory's Hugh F. MacMillan Law Library, the Journal naturally followed me here to Atlanta.

The transition from Connecticut to Georgia was far less traumatic for the IJLI than it was for my family, and especially for my two cats. They have yet to completely forgive the insult to their dignity of being transported in pet carriers to their new home in the wilds of the Atlanta suburbs. By contrast, the IJLI did not seem to mind making the trip cooped up in several cardboard boxes, a laptop and a flash drive.

My family is adjusting to differences in schools, houses, weather, and the local pronunciation of certain words, and my cats are (grudgingly) adjusting to new places for napping, stretching, and more napping. The principal adjustment for the IJLI is its new mailing address. You will see this change in the front matter and masthead of this issue. Everything else remains essentially the same.

Readers have probably noticed the delay in this issue of the IJLI. It was the transition to Emory that threw the Journal's publication schedule, well, off schedule. The delay is regrettable, but was also unavoidable. When explaining the delay to one of the contributors in this issue, he quipped that we would simply look forward to having Spring in October. I am happy to report that the IJLI is now back on schedule, so readers can look forward to receiving subsequent issues in due course.

This particular issue, albeit late, is quite a full one. Thomas Mills has edited and included nearly twenty book reviews, Lyonette Louis-Jacques has a very full International Calendar, and there are seven feature articles in this issue. This includes a wide range of material, long and short, and covering a broad array of subject matter. There is truly something in these pages for everyone. I hope you enjoy this issue!
