Teaching Children Science

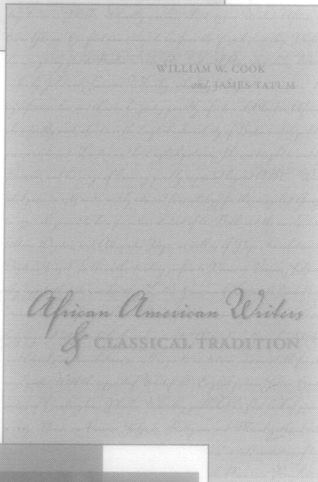

Hands-On Nature Study in North America,
1890-1930

Sally Gregory Kohlstedt

“Sally Gregory Kohlstedt provides one of the most thorough analyses now extant of how real change takes hold in American education. Ultimately, this study reveals the profound significance of the nature study movement as a progenitor of Progressive Era educational thought and pedagogy—where direct encounters with the world became the locus of inquiry and experience became ‘the mother of all discipline worthy of the name,’ as John Dewey famously put it.”

Nancy Beadie, University of Washington.

Schools Betrayed

Roots of Failure in Inner-City Education

Kathryn M. Neckerman

“Neckerman’s powerful analysis challenged my thinking about the root causes of educational inequality. She overturns traditional explanations about economic decline, labor markets, and oppositional culture to show how school policies increasingly distanced blacks and white immigrants from 1930 to 1960. Neckerman is one of the few scholars who directly links higher-level policy decisions to everyday teacher-student classroom dynamics. It’s an important story about much more than one city’s school system.”
