

As the result of these observations a general order was issued to inject 10 c.c. of normal sterile horse-serum in all patients during the active "flu" epidemic as soon as epistaxis was observed. In sixty cases in which this serum treatment was promptly carried out no mortality was recorded. Even where severe pneumonia developed the patients recovered. Of twenty-two cases transferred to the pneumonia wards before the serum could be injected, fifteen were fatal.

In eight out of a series of over seventy cases of so-called myringitis hæmorrhagica the bacteriological culture of the contents of the blebs showed the presence of Streptococcus hæmolyticus. The fauces, pharynx and the tonsils in almost all of the cases exhibited the same mahogany-red, intensely injected mucous membrane, and swabs from these throats demonstrated the presence of Streptococcus hæmolyticus. Within twenty-four to thirty-six hours after the initial symptoms of influenza there was admixture of pure blood with the sputum—an indication of localised tracheal bleeding. In the women's wards menstrual hæmorrhage occurred almost as early in the symptoms-complex as epistaxis, irrespective of the normal menstrual period of each patient. There were also several cases of intense hæmaturia.

Goldstein believes that hæmorrhage, hæmolysis and the Streptococcus hæmolyticus must have some close pathological relationship and identity.
