'That it should have been possible to produce such a book as this at all, at the present time, is a welcome surprise. That it should be the masterpiece of historical interpretation and constructive imagination that it certainly is, though written in such adverse circumstances, is a great feat of scholarship, and matter for warmest congratulation for all students of classical, oriental, and mediaeval antiquities. . . . Not merely a contribution to learning of the first importance, but a most companionable book.'—The Times Literary Supplement.

'A series of essays which Mr. W. H. Hudson might have written had he been an archaeologist. Mr. Crawford wants to turn us all (and how gladly we would be turned!) into field archaeologists. He makes us pursue not only historical and anthropological tracks, but such material ones as are hidden in bog and heath.'—The New Statesman.
