J. S. WHALE

The author of Christian Doctrine ('a first-rate example of the kind of Christian teaching which educated people need' according to the Church Times) here presents a new interpretation of early protestantism as seen in Luther, Calvin and the Sectarians, and against this background provides a searching treatment of such modern religious issues as tolerance and intolerance, and the conflict between Church and State. The book closes with a plea for Church unity

This new volume continues the story from 1336 to 1485, when many features of the modern world were germinating under the surface of medieval institutions.
