I am extremely grateful to the Head of the Archives and Manuscripts Department of the Wellcome Library for the History and Understanding of Medicine, Dr Richard Aspin, who, knowing of my interest in Edinburgh and Paris medicine in the early nineteenth century, told me of the purchase by the Library of the manuscript that became the basis of this book. I think it a great piece of good fortune that Mr Peter Metcalfe, the original owner, sold the manuscript to the Wellcome Library. He expressed pleasure when he heard that I was going to edit it and this spurred me on when I was flagging.

My most heartfelt thanks and sincere appreciation go to Professor Bill Bynum – my principal mentor from whom I have received so much generous guidance and support since my PhD studies all those years ago. Professor Bynum, when still an editor of Medical History, accepted my proposal for an edited version of the diary in the series of Supplements to the journal.

The staff of both the Wellcome Library and the Rare Books division of the British Library deserve my enduring gratitude. They include some who have performed very special favours for me, such as John Symons, who made available unclassified French material from the Wellcome collections, and those who went personally to the bowels of the British Library when there were difficulties over the catalogues. For invaluable assistance in interpreting the prescription symbols and substances, I am indebted to Dr Melvin Earles who gave most generously of his time and specialist pharmaceutical knowledge. I also owe a debt to Dr Tony Woods of the Wellcome Trust for his encouragement and support.

I am immensely grateful to successive directors of the Wellcome Trust Centre for the History of Medicine at UCL for the use of office space and other facilities. The present director, Professor Hal Cook, has generously enabled me to continue my association with the Centre and has consistently encouraged me in my work. Dr Anne Hardy, co-editor of Medical History with Professor Cook, has read sections of my work and offered valuable observations. Alan Shiel, the Centre Administrator, with his unique – and at times deliciously quirky – talents for working with his colleagues and students, has been throughout a very special support to me. Carol Bowen did much of the typing, showing a real talent for deciphering my handwriting, and Vera Man opened my eyes to some of the intricacies of Microsoft Word. Without their help, the task of producing the manuscript would have been much harder. Joan Yearwood has not only ensured a never failing supply of coffee, tea and hot chocolate for us all but with her wise comments on life has been and continues to be a real comfort.

Finally I must pay a huge tribute to Caroline Tonson-Rye, who has been more than a copy-editor, and who will, no doubt, continue to have nightmares over the length of some of my footnotes. Despite a few little “discussions” towards the end, Caroline and I remain very good friends. She has throughout the writing stage cast a very professional and constructive eye over my work and saved me from many infelicities of style. Any errors though are attributable to me alone.
