

shown, in every case depend on a sound preparation for matrimony; the first chapters of the book discussing problems of courtship and the social relations between adolescents of both sexes. The tale of misery resulting from a partnership between superficial acquaintances, or one based on mere sexual attraction, is unfolded daily in the divorce courts of America. The attempt of some American towns to commercialise 'marriage' ceremonies, as though they were commodities to be purchased for cash at a moment's notice; the facilities provided by some states for divorce; the propagation of contraceptive practices; and the unheeding, almost encouraging, attitude of the secular Press to these evils; all are condemned by Dr Schmiedeler as primary causes of the destruction of the Christian ideal of marriage.

The latter part of the book is concerned with the family; the rights of the family, and the obligations of the state towards this social unit.

The advice given throughout is clear and practical, showing a keen appreciation of the difficulties and problems before and after marriage. The introduction of photographic illustrations is a brilliant idea, and they add greatly to the attractiveness of a textbook which commends itself to those responsible for the education of Catholic youth.

THE DEEVIL'S WALTZ. By Sydney Goodsir Smith. Illustrated by Denis Peploe. No. 7, Poetry Scotland Series. (MacLellan; 6s.)

The title poem and a dozen or so others show the lyrical power and turn of satire which have drawn attention to him. But much of the present volume is dreary going. At times the language seems laboured, and is helped out by clichés; though even in the dullest work there comes now and then a line that startles and holds.

The scheme was a voluntary one, undertaken by Oxford House which for sixty years has played a prominent part in the social life of Bethnal Green. At a time when the voluntary principle is being crowded out of the national life as rapidly as bureaucracy can manage (and that, fortunately, is never likely to be very rapidly or very effectively), any reminder of what can be achieved to fill the gaps of state-provided social services is of interest. The basis of the Oxford House scheme was the evacuation of family groups and, despite much improvisation and easy acceptance of educational theories of a dubious usefulness, Citizens in Readiness certainly records a valuable experiment. But it is shocking to find a total indifference to the world the schools invaded; remote, rural,
