

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

SANDRA BURMAN is a Research Fellow at Queen Elizabeth House, University of Oxford, and at the University of Cape Town. Her publications have included books on the imposition of law, both in Lesotho and, more widely, on women and work and on tort liability in both domestic and industrial settings. Over the past decade she has focused on the effects of urbanization and apartheid legislation on legal and family structures in South Africa.

ROBERT J. BURSİK, JR., is Associate Professor of Sociology and Co-director of the Center for the Study of Crime, Delinquency and Social Control at the University of Oklahoma. His previous research focuses on informal social control processes at the neighborhood level. Current projects include a study of attitudes toward the death penalty.

GREGORY A. CALDEIRA is Professor of Political Science at Ohio State University. He has written numerous articles on courts and judges in American politics. His current research interests include the influence of organized interest on agenda setting in the Supreme Court; the mobilization and impact of interest groups on nominations to the federal courts, especially in the late 1980s; and connections between mass and elite publics and the Court.

HAROLD G. GRASMICK is Professor of Sociology and Co-director of the Center for the Study of Crime, Delinquency and Social Control at the University of Oklahoma. His previous research attempts to integrate deterrence theory with other theories of social control. Current projects include an examination of the links between religion, rational choice, and crime.

ROBERT M. HAYDEN teaches in the Department of Anthropology and the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs at the University of Pittsburgh. In addition to his work on the folklore and cultural logic of the political rhetoric regarding tort liability, his current research interests are in law and language. He had done research in India, Yugoslavia, and among the Seneca Indians of New York State.

WILFRIED SCHÄRF is Senior Lecturer at, and currently Director of, the Institute of Criminology at the University of Cape Town. His research interests have ranged from the politics of liquor production, distribution, and consumption in South Africa, to street gangs and street children. Political developments in South Africa since 1985 led him to focus more intensely on formal and informal policing, including abuse of power by the state.

CARL E. SCHNEIDER is Professor of Law at the University of Michigan. He writes in the area of family law and is currently completing a casebook on that subject.

RONEN SHAMIR is a doctoral student in the Department of Sociology at Northwestern University. He received a LL.B. degree from Tel Aviv University. For the past three years he has studied the role of lawyers and courts in the context of Israel's policies in the occupied territories. His current research interests focus on theories of professionalism and the political functions of the legal profession.

TAKAO TANASE is Professor in the Department of Law at Kyoto University and currently a chairman of an organizing committee of the Japan Law and Society Association. He is the author of a number of books and articles on the judicial process, legal professions, and dispute settlement.

PETER J. VAN KOPPEN is a psychologist at the Faculty of Law of Erasmus University, Rotterdam, The Netherlands. His research interests include civil law negotiations, justice behavior, and judicial elites. His current research focuses on execution of civil verdicts and the role of publication of judicial decisions. Recently, he co-edited the volume Lawyers on Psychology and Psychologists on Law (1988).

JOHN R. WRIGHT is Associate Professor of Political Science at the University of Iowa. His research generally is on interest groups and policymaking in the United States. Currently he is studying interest group mobilization on judicial nominations during the second Reagan administration.
