

An Interdisciplinary Research Forum

Journal of Aging and Health

Editor: Kyriakos S. Markides,

University of Texas Medical Branch, Galveston

The fastest area of growth in the field of aging is gerontological health. But until now, researchers, scholars and professionals alike have found it necessary to scan dozens of journals, books and conference papers to keep up with the latest findings on aging and its affects on health.

The Journal of Aging and Health provides a much-needed forum for research and scholarly exchange on the health of older persons, including health service utilization and the epidemiology of diseases common to aging.

With an interdisciplinary approach, Journal of Aging and Health provides a variety of perspectives important to the understanding of both aging and health. Articles explore a variety of fields, including:

- Behavioral Sciences
- Allied Health
- Social Sciences
- Psychology
- Public Health
- Social Work
- Epidemiology
- Medicine
- Demography

Quarterly: February, May, August, November

GENDER, AGING & THE STATE

Barbara Nichols and Peter Leonard, editors

This book focuses on the impact gender, class, and ethnicity have on the social position of older people. While the possibility of individual intentions counting for something in old age is strongly asserted, the studies and reflections demonstrate the power material resources have in determining the relative freedom and independence of older people. Resisting tendencies to treat the categories of gender, class and ethnicity in a homogeneous manner, these essays give voice to older people, taking their stories as the basis for its theoretical and political analysis.

Both members of the Department of Social Work at McGill University, Nichols and Leonard gathered material for this book for many years. Leonard is author of Personality and Ideology and General Editor of Critical Texts in Social Work and the Welfare State.
