“Distinction of mind, of bearing, of character . . . characterised him always.”

Ryle was an outstanding clinician and an original clinical investigator, his work on the fractional test meal and the introduction of “Ryle’s tube” for taking gastric samples earning him an international reputation. With a holistic approach to medicine he saw the physician as a naturalist who must study how and why man reacts to disease as well as how disease progresses in man.

The awareness of a wider perspective led to his accepting the first chair of social medicine, at Oxford, where among his pupils was Michael Shepherd, now professor at the Institute of Psychiatry, who has written the introduction to the new Keynes Press edition of Ryle’s The Natural History of Disease. First published in 1936, the collection of 34 lectures and essays is written in an unpretentiously clear and elegant style, setting out Ryle’s observations on disease states and the principles underlying his work and outlook. Startlingly relevant today, it is also, as Michael Shepherd says, a classic in its own right.

A SENSE OF ASHER

Why are medical journals so dull?

Richard Asher, who asked the question, was never dull: good sense, pungent wit, and lively humour were his hallmarks, while his writings on clinical matters, with their combination of lucidity, sympathy, and insight, remain models for all aspiring medical authors. A Sense of Asher, a selection of his writings chosen and introduced by Ruth Holland, was first published in a Keynes Press limited edition which quickly sold out. This paperback version, now in its third reprinting, contains the complete text of the original, which includes

- ★ Apriority
- ★ The physical basis of mental illness
- ★ A case of health
- ★ The use of statistics in medicine
- ★ Intracranial and extracranial computers
- ★ Why are medical journals so dull?

Autobiographical

The BMJ's new series of books of general interest by medical writers

The MEMOIR Club

Cynical

Polemical

The second book in the series, published in November 1987, is Recollections and Reflections by Douglas Black. His recollections are of his remarkable career, in which he has been professor of medicine at Manchester university, chief scientist at the DHSS, president of the Royal College of Physicians, and the occupant of important posts when officially "retired". His reflections are on the practice and progress of medicine, university teaching and administration, public service, and life in general. Absorbing and provocative, the book bears its author's hallmarks of insight, scholarly precision, and dry wit.
