Two outstanding works

EPISTEMOLOGY ONTOLOGY

BOTH BY THE REV. F. VAN STEENBERGHEN

It would be difficult to praise these two volumes too highly. In the first place the need for something of this kind is very great in England. Some good work of course has been done by native philosophers, Professor Hawkins is outstanding and also Fr Hughes. But here we have a full summary of the Thomist synthesis in these two subjects. Professor Steenberghen does not claim to do anything more than provide a student's introduction to each subject. Thus, on the one hand he avoids overloading with abstruse and unnecessary side issues; and on the other he is careful to start at the beginning. It is those initial steps which are so essential for the beginner. Leave them out, and it is like leaving out the water when boiling the kettle.

It would be difficult to praise, I repeat, the publication of these translations too highly, for another reason. Metaphysics and Epistemology are two subjects most in need of elucidation today. It is for lack of sound metaphysics that modern philosophers are floundering in a morass of uncertainties.

The approach to the proof for the existence of God is the most refreshing statement of the situation I have seen. It does not treat St Thomas as infallible, at least in his arrangement; it recognizes that his approach was conditioned to a certain extent by the time in which he lived. We feel as we read that at last the cobwebs have been brushed aside and we face the problem in a purely metaphysical frame of mind.

Through a true understanding of the nature of Being and of the primary object of our perception alone will a sound treatment of epistemology and of metaphysics be restored. And if this is the true diagnosis of the modern malady of philosophers, then they must begin with repeated doses of metaphysics, and could not do better than begin with these two books.'—The Dublin Review.
